Inception, review

Leonardo Di Caprio stars in Christopher Nolan's unmissable and maddening thriller about dream invasion. The Big Idea here is dream invasion. Leonardo DiCaprio is Dom Cobb, specialist-for-hire in the art of "extracting" information from sleeping subjects. He and his crew hook themselves up with wires to the drugged targets and infiltrate their subconscious, as they're caught doing in the opening bit with a Japanese businessman, Saito (Ken Watanabe). Their job is to sneak about inside the palace of your mind like stealthy cat burglars of the id.

Dropping us in mid-mission and giving only just enough to go on, it's a nifty, show-don't-tell introduction – In fairness, the labyrinths that open up when Cobb and his team attempt "inception" – that's to say, the implanting of an idea in the mind rather than its theft – do require a hefty ball of twine to navigate. A dream team is assembled: newbie world-designer Ariadne (Ellen Page), identity forger Eames (Tom Hardy, a dry gift here), pharmacist Yusuf (Dileep Rao) and Cobb's regular point man Arthur (Joseph Gordon-Levitt). Their target is Robert Fischer (Cillian Murphy, precise and valuable), the son of an ailing energy tycoon (Pete Postlethwaite) whose business empire Saito wants broken up after his death. When the movie builds up a head of steam, it's dazzling and protean, and almost anything seems possible...

Smart, innovative, and thrilling, Inception is that rare blockbuster that succeeds viscerally as well as intellectually.
